Not illustrated. 1916 Excerpt: . . . information and as much further information as may be of enlightening value. It is also desirable, for many reasons, that a standard form of traffic record be generally adopted. However, the minor differences in effect between various kinds of vehicles decreases in importance with the increase in number and variety of traffic. It would, therefore, seem to be quite sufficient to establish a standard form of comparatively simple classification for use on the heaviest traveled streets, which could be further elaborated, by sub-divisions where so desired, for use in particular cases where the frequency of traffic was not such as to preclude the possibility of obtaining information on the minor points. The segregation of a traffic count on Fifth Avenue into numbers and classes of vehicles moving north and south would be difficult and of doubtful value in studies affecting the selection of a pavement for...
