We have short courses in agriculture, where, in three months, at small expense, the farmer s boy can learn more of the real truth about farming than his father was able to acquire in years. That lecture that you listened to by Professor Woods, remarkable because of its statements of the latest known facts concerning the biology of the cow, was a thing that you could no more have had thirty years ago when your fathers commenced the study of the cow than you could have of the farthest thing in the world. I ransacked all Europe for books upon this question, and in every language that it was possible to obtain any. It s only within recent years that such things Agr.--20 have been possible. I sometimes think that our farmers do not begin to appreciate the progress that has been made. We have our farm institutes traveling over the states, and manned by the best practical teachers we can procure. We have the best dairy papers, dairy books, and dairy literature scattered broadcast over the land. All these things we have, and still the average farmer with his average cow is just about where he was forty years ago. The average cow yields the same 3,000 pounds of milk that she did when I was a boy, and the average farmer produces the milk from her just as expensively as ever. There is something wrong here. Who is it, and where is...
