Lafayette understood that she would give it to him herself. Accordingly, about half an hour afterward, Mrs. Livingston r He obtains money of his mother. He goes to Lockwood s. brought her purse, and, taking out a five dollar gold piece from it, she gave it to Lafayette, and told him that he might go to Mr. Lockwood s and buy what he required. So Lafayette, putting the gold piece into his pocket, went out into Broadway. He held up his finger to the driver of an omnibus that was going by. The driver drew up to the side-walk, and Lafayette got in. The street was brilliantly lighted up. Thousands of people were going to and fro upon the broad walks that extended along the sides of it, while omnibuses, carriages, and carts, in great numbers, were thundering over the pavement in the middle. Lafayette soon reached the book-store and went in. One of the clerks showed him a variety of boxes of pencils. Lafayette chose a set of Faber s, that were put up in an ornamented morocco case. He then inquired for drawing books, and the clerk opened a drawer which contained a great number of them--some English, some French, and some American+and also several packs of drawing cards. There was one drawing book and one pack of cards which Lafayette liked better than any of the others. For a time, however, he was at a loss...
